

Question: Do you have to sacrifice creativity in order to gain structure?

I think about that movie, "Yours, Mine And Ours". There's a scene where the extremely creative leading lady throws a fit because some of the children organized her work room. It had looked like a mess, but it was one she was comfortable with. In fact, she felt paralyzed by the rearrangement.

I also think about a foreword by Jim Henson's daughter I read once. She said the house was always a wreck - a creative chaos.

I've read that creatives thrive in in an environment that would torture an organized and structured person.

What are your thoughts? Please comment with your opinions on this. Are you a creative who throws out the rules? Or are you an organization fanatic who loves to label? Or maybe you're someone who's successfully (at least some of the time) married the two? Tell your story.
